GRAND JURY

Its Vital Function in Guarding Our Liberties as Expressed in the Constitution

YOU don't read much about the proceedings of a grand jury in our news. There are two reasons why its proceedings are kept secret. Firstly, if the charges against a man are dismissed, the case is unreported, and the man's reputation does not suffer. Secondly, if the grand jury returns an indictment against someone and at the same time, it reduces the chances of his appearing before he can be arrested.

The "grand" in the grand jury, by the way, does not refer to the importance of this institution, although it does happen to be a vitally important part of our legal system. The name is derived from the old Norman French terminology, signifying its size. The other is the "petit" or little jury.

The number of jurors serving varies according to the different states. In New York State, for example, there are 25 persons on the grand jury, and at least 16 members must be present before any action can legally be taken.

In various states, the grand jury system has been attacked as a needless expense and duplication, but you will soon see that these criticisms are groundless.

Let's consider the case of a man under period of suspicion. He appears before the grand jury after the prosecution has presented the evidence against him. He cannot be forced to appear before them here, and can only do so after first signing an agreement that his testimony can be used against him.

If the defendant is innocent, or wishes to make it appear that he is, he willingly signs this paper, called a waiver of immunity. The jurors, who have heard the case against this man, now question him carefully on the various points.

The entire procedure usually takes about an hour. If the evidence presented convinces the Grand Jury of the defendant's guilt, then a formal charge, known as an indictment, is filed with the clerk, and the man is held for trial.

But if the Grand Jury is convinced of the man's innocence, then the charge is dismissed, and the defendant is re-based as quickly on the proper papers can be signed.

In a court of law, this trial might have run into weeks, and on many days, months, at a cost of many thousands of dollars. And on the instance of the defendant's innocence, almost every penny of the thousands of dollars would be saved.

Of course, a great deal more than money has been saved in terms of the money spared the defendant, and the loss of reputation which he would suffer in a public trial.

Since the proceedings of a grand jury are always secret, matters are kept secret in the grand jury room. If you could be present at the first session of a new grand jury, that is what you would see.

The first action to be taken is the selection of a foreman from among the jurors, an assistant foreman to assist the foreman and act in his place whenever necessary, and a secretary to keep the records.

The jury is seated formally facing the table where the witnesses will be sworn. These witnesses, here to give their testimony in the various scheduled cases, wait in an adjoining room with the prosecutor or district attorney.

The district attorney calls his witnesses before the grand jury. In much the same manner as he hopes later to present the case in criminal court if he wins an indictment here, the district attorney calls to the witness table one witness after another, even presenting this evidence such articles as the murder weapons, etc., to be marked as Exhibits.

Throughout the questioning, the jurors make notes, confer among themselves, and, if they choose, take over the questioning of the witness when the district attorney is finished. The jurors, it must be remembered, are not here as an adjunct of the police, or the district attorney's office.

If the jury can be said to represent anyone, then it represents the defendant. The jurors, more than anything, want to learn the truth. The big question mark throughout the entire proceedings is: Is there sufficient evidence against this man to warrant placing him on trial for his life? You can be sure that the D. A. will have to present an airtight case before an indictment will be returned.

The Grand Jury has one more power: It can, if it concludes as a result of its investigation, that hoodlums are not being prosecuted with sufficient zeal, demand that the district attorney appoint a SPECIAL PROSECUTOR to investigate these hoodlums.

Thus, as you can see, the Grand Jury performs a vital function as a guardian of our liberties, living up to the ideal expressed in the Constitution of the United States, that:

"The person shall not be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury."

—Jack E. Miller
